Displacement

Nasir Khusraw Balkhi Camp is an urban, informal settlement based in Kabul's District 4. The land is owned by the Government of Afghanistan and residents are not currently paying rent. The settlement provides shelter to a Pashtun community of IDPs, originating from Laghman province.

The initial influx of IDPs was the largest seen by the camp, with 45 households arriving in 2002. A second and last reported wave of IDPs entered the site in 2007, adding a further 15 homes. The site has remained stable over the past nine years, with spatial constraints preventing new residents from joining.

Residents reportedly intend to stay within the settlement as they have access to education and health facilities. They also reported that they feel they have no other shelter options available.
