Displacement

Tamir-e-Mili Bus is a unique informal settlement, in which half of its residents live inside a building owned by the Afghan Government's Department of Transport and the other half is residing in privately-owned households in the surrounding area. All residents do not currently pay rent. The settlement is composed of an equal number of people coming from Tajik and Pashtun communities. IDP residents originate from a variety of locations across Afghanistan, including Parwan, Kapisa and Laghman, while the returnees travelled from Peshawar in Pakistan and Markazi in Iran.

The settlement was established by two households from Sayd Khel, Parwan in 2002. Later that same year, a second influx of six households joined the settlement, moving from Markazi, Iran. A final wave in 2002 consisted of 83 households, with IDPs from Laghan and Kapisa, and returnees from Peshawar, Pakistan and Markazi, Iran.

The site has since remained stable, with no additional arrivals after 2002 as the settlement is not able to expand. Most residents reportedly do not plan to leave in the near future as they feel they have nowhere else to go.
