Displacement

Ahmad Jan Camp is one of three informal settlements based in Qala-e Barqi, close to Chori Froshan Camp. The settlement has been built on privately owned land. Each household's rent is collected and pooled by a settlement committee which then pays the landowner a monthly sum of 41,000 Afghanis. Pashtun communities comprise 75% of the population and the remaining quarter consists of Tajiks. The settlement is entirely populated by returnees previously residing in Peshawar, Pakistan.

The first influx of 50 households established the settlement in 2002. A second wave of 30 households joined the site in 2003 followed by a further 49 households a year later. The settlement then saw a period of stability before the arrival of a final 8 households in October 2016. The site is now saturated, with no new households able to join in 2017.

Residents reportedly intend to stay in the settlement for the foreseeable future as they are provided with access to food and essential services including health clinics and schools.
